IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

No. .....

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO. INC., a corporation, and ANTONIO FRANCISCO,

Petitioners,

vs.

ROBERT A. NORDYKE,

Respondent.

PETITION FOR WRIT.

To the Honorable the Supreme Court of the United States, the Honorable Chief Justice and the Honorable Associated Justices Thereof:

May it please the Court:

The undersigned on behalf of Van Camp Sea Food Co. Inc., a corporation, and Antonio Francisco, prays that a writ of certiorari issue to review the judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit entered in the above-entitled cause, numbered therein No. 10392.

Opinion Below.

The opinion of the court below [R. 237-252] is reported in 140 F. (2d) 902. The case having been tried to a jury there was no opinion in the District Court (Southern District of California).

Jurisdiction.

The judgment of the Circuit Court of Appeals was entered February 11, 1944 [R. 236]. A petition for rehearing was seasonably made, entertained and denied on April 5, 1944 [R. 253].

The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925 (28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 347).

Summary and Statement of Matters Involved.

Robert A. Nordyke was employed by Van Camp Sea Food Co. on August 1st, 1941, as a radio operator and fisherman aboard the Madeirense, a fishing vessel approximately 125 feet long, about 330 tons gross, and 200 tons tuna carrying capacity, leaving the Port of San Diego, on or about August 27, 1941 [R. 43].

The contract was a written contract consisting of the Shipping Articles [R. 81]. Respondent, before signing the Shipping Articles, talked with petitioner Antonio Francisco, who was the master of the vessel [R. 45]. The vessel was owned by Van Camp Sea Food Co., Antonio Francisco and several other members of the crew [R. 45]. In September of 1941, Antonio Francisco, the master of the Madeirense, was fishing on a share basis. The amount of money he made depended upon the amount of fish caught and he received his money in accordance with the quantity [R. 202].

On September 14, 1942, near the Galapagos Islands, respondent, while fishing, was thrown up against the fishing rail when a Tuna hit the fishing line, at which time respondent and one Pires were handling one line. Respondent's right wrist was injured [R. 46-47].

Immediately after the injury, the chief engineer took respondent's arm and tried to pull it into place. It was out of place. A few minutes after that the captain came down and did the same thing three or four times [R. 51]. At noon time on said day, respondent sent a telegraph message to the United States Marine Hospital at San Francisco, describing the injury and received a reply within an hour [R. 52-53]. The message from the United States Marine Hospital diagnosed the injury as an imperfect broken wrist bone and advised the master "to get immovable wrist by placing a thin piece of box paste under surface of arm from elbow to tips of fingers and bind it in place with roller. Bandages not too tight wath (sic) circulation. Place arm in ice pack aspirine gash ten minutes every four hours. Make for nearest port for X-ray and proper medical care" [R. 55].

The lower court states that "the evidence reveals that the instructions contained within the wireless message relating to the treatment of the injury were substantially carried out by the master" [R. 245].

The boat fished all day September 14th and all day September 15th. I made complaint to the captain as to the pain. He asked me on a number of occasions how much it hurt. I told him it hurt very badly, during the day and during the night. I couldn't sleep. I was walking up and down the deck, and the captain on a number of occasions came out from his room and walked with me. About this time I wanted the master to go to the Galapagos Island where he and I both knew that there was an intern at Wreck Bay. We did go to San Cristobal, Galapagos. We arrived there on the morning of the 16th. A doctor came aboard. The doctor said it very definitely was broken but he did not have any X-ray or any equipment to handle any such thing. He told me the best thing to do was to go somewhere immediately where there was an X-ray, where I could get medical attention [Respondent's testimony, R. 57-59].

When I got to San Cristobal, the Ecuadorean doctor provided there came aboard at that port. He touched my wrist with his hand; he took the bandages off. He felt around, to see what was the matter. Then he put a splint on [Respondent's testimony, R. 98].

I think it was after I had seen the port doctor at San Cristobal that I sent a wireless message to Van Camp at San Diego [Respondent's testimony, R. 98].

The message is as follows: "Radio operator Madeirense broken arm. Belle ready to go home. If all right may he go with him at Galapagos. Answer immediately" [Respondent's testimony, R. 100].

Soon after the vessel arrived at San Cristobal I sent the wireless to the Van Camp at San Diego asking if I could come back to San Diego on the Belle of Portugal [Respondent's testimony, R. 129].

The answer came back that it was all right to come home on the Belle of Portugal provided I had a master's certificate with a statement of the injury [Respondent's testimony, R. 61].

A little later that night, I believe, we met a United States destroyer. It pulled up alongside and the only medical man they had aboard was a pharmacist's mate. The pharmacist's mate aboard the destroyer told the captain and several others, in his presence, that if it were left for any amount of time, I think he said about two weeks, it would set and might cause further complications [Respondent's testimony, R. 63-64].

He (the pharmacist's mate) said it was definitely broken, and it should be taken into Panama or some near port, as soon as possible. He did approximately the same thing that was done before. He took off the splint and bandage and put on a slightly more flexible one of his own, of some sort. He said he had no X-ray or material to work with. He gave me codein or something of that sort to deaden the pain, then the destroyer left [Respondent's testimony, R. 62-63].

I might have said to Dr. William McLellan, with whom I talked at the United States Public Health Service in San Diego on October 11, 1941, that "he (the pharmacist's mate) did a wonderful job putting on a splint" [Respondent's testimony, R. 156-157].

When I was having my communication with the radio operator of the Belle of Portugal the message which came in to me from the operator of the Belle of Portugal was given by me to the master of the Madeirense. I believe I told the master of the Madeirense that the Madeirense would meet the Belle of Portugal at either 11 a. m. or 12 o'clock noon on a certain day at a certain place. Immediately upon receiving the message from the Belle of Portugal and telling the master about it, the Madeirense proceeded toward the place where I said the Belle of Portugal would be at noon time on the day fixed. The Madeirense proceeded to that place at a speed in excess of the normal cruising speed for that vessel; it proceeded at forced draft. When the Madeirense arrived at the place where I understood it was to meet the Belle of Portugal at the appointed time, the Belle of Portugal was not there [Respondent's testimony, R. 120-121].

I told the master of the Madeirense that the mix-up resulted from my conclusion that I was merely to get in touch by radio with the Belle of Portugal whereas the Belle of Portugal understood that I was to be transferred aboard the Belle of Portugal at noon time on that day [Respondent's testimony, R. 124-125].

About five or six days following the injury, the severe pain subsided and during the balance of the time up to the time that I got to San Diego, I wasn't in what I would call any acute distress; just a matter of the throbbing, etc. [Respondent's testimony, R. 125].

Subsequent to five or six days following the date of the accident I did not complain to anybody about my pain [Respondent's testimony, R. 127]. I did not ask the master to take me to the Canal Zone [Respondent's testimony, R. 123-124].

I once said to Mr. Pires (a fellow fisherman) that I did not like to ask the captain to take me to the Canal Zone from the fishing grounds. I mentioned the subject that fishing was good, and that the vessel was on the fishing grounds, as one of my reasons for not wanting to suggest to the captain that he take me to the Canal Zone. That conversation was before I missed the Belle of Portugal [Respondent's testimony, R. 127-128].

I did not ask the master of the Madeirense to take me on the Madeirense from the fishing grounds or wherever I was to San Diego or any place else [Respondent's testimony, R. 132].

Within three days after the Belle of Portugal had been missed I stated in substance to Mr. L. F. Cunningham, on the Madeirense, that I did not want to be put on any other boat to go back to San Diego or anywhere else and that I was satisfied to stay on board the Madeirense until it got back to San Diego [Respondent's testimony, R. 132-133].

From a period of time three days after the meeting of the Belle of Portugal had been missed, it is true that I generally throughout told the members of the crew on the Madeirense that I thought I was getting along all right, and that I would just as soon stay with the Madeirense until I got back to San Digeo [Respondent's testimony, R. 133].

At the time I went to the facilities of the United States Public Health Service in San Diego I saw a doctor. The doctor sent me to an X-ray place in San Diego to have X-rays taken of my injured arm. According to my recollection the X-ray was taken of the arm which had been in a splint. He told me to get the X-rays and then he would be able to work on me on Tuesday following; he thought he could by that time; I got the X-rays and then decided to go to my own doctor. I don't think the United States Public Health Service doctor in San Diego said anything about the facilities there at San Diego. I believe he said that the reason he was not going to be able to work on me until the following Tuesday was that the facilities of the United States Public Health Service was overcrowded. I don't know. I don't remember his reason exactly, but I have a feeling that it was because it were overcrowded. I am not sure [Respondent's testimony, R. 152-153].

The only evidence of the required competency (that of a qualified surgeon) as to the result of the medical care actually furnished up to the time of respondent's arrival in San Diego is the testimony of the commanding officer of the United States Public Health Service in the San Diego district, William Edwin McLellan.

The testimony of the doctor, William Edwin McLellan, which is uncontradicted includes the following pertinent statements of expert opinion as to the effectiveness of the actual medical care that was furnished:

1. His case did not require any hospital attention whatever at the time of my examination [R. 160].

2. The X-ray that was then taken of Nordyke's ulna bone pursuant to my direction shows no pathology of any kind. The X-ray was taken by a man of national reputation who specializes in X-rays. His interpretation was "no pathology in the arm or wrist" [R. 160-161].

3. "10/11/41.—Report of X-ray examination of right forearm: A P and lateral projections of lower two-thirds of the right forearm and wrist show no evidence of bone or joint injury.

"Diagnosis: 1. Injury, old, right arm" [R. 165].

4. When a man suffers an injury of the kind Mr. Nordyke complained of, the first thing that ought to be done, if there is no hemorrhage, is "you immobilize the part, so he doesn't use it; then you alleviate the pain in many different ways" [R. 175].

5. "Going back to the X-ray that was taken by the official source through your instrumentality, is there anything in that X-ray that indicates to you that this plaintiff was then suffering from any serious injury of any kind or character A. I see no pathological condition of any kind" [R. 181].

6. "Q. Look at that X-ray. Is it your opinion from the X-ray that this plaintiff had suffered any serious bone injury within a month of the time that X-ray was taken? A. No, sir. I see nothing there. You ask me as to pathology. I will say this down in here is what we call a little mouse." That is a rheumatoid condition, usually an arthritic condition. There isn't anything that indicates to me that this man has sustained any serious injury at all within a month of the time the X-ray was taken [R. 181].

7. When Mr. Nordyke was examined on October 11, 1941, his right forearm was in a splint made of makeshift materials consisting of wire, etc., but substantial enough. He had had the existing splint on for the preceding two weeks [R. 165].

Dr. McLellan also testified that respondent "complimented the pharmacist's mate extensively" [R. 160].

The only medical testimony introduced by respondent was that given by Dr. Alfred E. Gallant. Dr. Gallant is the individual referred to in the opinion of the court below as "an admittedly qualified orthopedic specialist who examined Nordyke a few days before the trial" [R. 247]. Over the objection of petitioners that the evidence was hearsay and did not constitute proof of the existence of the alleged happening, the trial court permitted said doctor to testify as follows:

1. The doctor at San Cristobal, Galapagos, made no attempt to determine the exact nature of the fracture.

2. Owing to the crowded condition in the United States Public Health Service in San Diego, respondent went to his home in San Jose.

3. Radiograph taken at San Jose showed an injury to the lower end of the right ulna and it was necessary to remove a piece of this bone [R. 104].

Over the objection of petitioners that the document was not competent proof of any fact, the trial court permitted respondent to introduce as substantive evidence a letter written by Dr. Gallant to one of respondent's counsel. Said letter contains the following statements:

1. He (respondent) was examined later by a doctor at San Cristobal, Galapagos, who applied a splint but made no attempt to determine the exact nature of the fracture.

2. Owing to crowded condition in the United States Public Health Service in San Diego, he (respondent) went to his home in San Jose.

3. Radiographs (taken in San Jose) snowed an injury to the lower end of the right ulna and it was necessary to remove a piece of this bone [R. 105-107].

The trial court permitted said doctor to testify as follows:

1. That the ideal time when a person suffering a fracture should receive medical care is as soon as possible.

2. When the fracture occurs the taking of radiographs at once is standard practice today or malpractice is in the offing [R. 114].

3. "Q. If this injury had been properly treated, X-rayed and properly treated three days after it occurred, what would your opinion be as to whether he would have suffered the permanent disability which now appears? * * * A. If it were properly reduced, treated—put it all in the word 'treatment' I don't think there would have been any permanent disability" [R. 116-117].

4. "Q. What is standard and proper practice, doctor, where a fracture has occurred * * * A. The ideal treatment, according to circumstances, as stated before, is, if X-rays are available, to take pictures, and if not available immediately, to get them as soon as possible * * * Q. By Mr. Resner: That is, get proper treatment as soon as you can get to a place A. Get to a place where you can get the right treatment" [R. 117-118].

The doctor also testified: Respondent did not give me any X-rays purportedly taken in San Jose. As a matter of fact, I didn't see any X-rays at all except the one that I ordered taken. In order for me to tell from a surgical standpoint what the exact injury was on board this vessel, I would have to see either the patient at the time of the injury or an X-ray exhibiting the bony condition at the time [R. 119].

The trial court instructed the jury, over the objection of the petitioners, as follows:

1. "The master, vessel, and its owners are legally obliged to furnish proper medical care to the injured seaman within the earliest possible time, even though the seaman does not request care" [R. 226]. (Emphasis added.)

2. "The plaintiff claims in this case that his present condition is due to, and has been caused by the failure and neglect of the defendant to provide him with adequate and competent medical and hospital services at the earliest reasonable opportunity. If the plaintiff has proved to your satisfaction, and by a preponderance of the evidence, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, that the defendant failed to supply him with proper medical care and attention at the earliest reasonable opportunity and that as a result thereof the use and strength of his hand and wrist have been lost in whole or in part due to such negligent failure on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff has made out a case and is entitled as a matter of law to damages from the defendants" [R. 225-226]. (Emphasis added.)

3. "If you find from all the facts and circumstances in this case that said Francisco was negligent in failing to provide plaintiff with proper medical care, * * * the defendant company is liable for the consequences of Francisco's negligence" [R. 226]. (Emphasis added.)

4. "In this case, regardless of whether or not you decide that defendant was negligent, you are instructed to award plaintiff maintenance. In other words, a seaman such as plaintiff, who is taken sick in the service of a vessel, is entitled to maintenance from the defendant shipowner. Maintenance is awarded regardless of fault on defendant's part and even if defendant is not at fault. Maintenance is to include such a sum of money as is reasonably necessary to maintain plaintiff until he was able to return to work" [R. 226-227].

The trial court refused to instruct the jury at the request of petitioners that "the only duty which rested upon the master of the vessel in the case at bar was to exercise that amount of care and judgment which would have been exercised under all of the circumstances shown by the evidence by an ordinarily prudent person not possessing the knowledge or skill of a physician or surgeon" [R. 220-222].

Questions Presented.

1. Whether a cause of action for compensatory damages resulting from a failure of the master of a vessel to furnish medical care is created or affected by the Jones Act, or has its sole and exclusive origin in the general maritime law?

2. In the absence of allegations and proof showing diversity of citizenship, may a seaman maintain an action for damages at law in a United States District Court, when his claim is predicated upon an alleged negligent failure on the part of the master of a vessel to provide medical care?

3. In the absence of allegations and proof showing the existence of the required jurisdictional amount and diversity of citizenship, may a seaman maintain an action at law in a United States District Court for damages on account of a breach, without negligence, of the contractual duty to provide medical care?

4. Is the employer of a seaman who is injured or suffers illness in the service of the ship, required at his peril, to provide proper, adequate and competent medical care and attention or is the contractual duty confined to and discharged by furnishing ordinary medical care?

5. The trial court erroneously instructed the jury at the request of respondent and erroneously failed to give instructions at the request of petitioners.

6. The evidence as to the first cause of action fails to establish actionable negligence on the part of the master of the vessel and the jury should have been instructed to find a verdict for the defendants on the first cause of action.

7. Is a fisherman a merchant marine seaman within the meaning of the word "seaman" as contained in the Jones Act?

Reasons for Granting the Writ.

1. The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided an important question of federal law which has not been, but should be, settled by this Court.

2. The Circuit Court of Appeals has decided a vital question in a way probably in conflict with applicable decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

3. The Circuit Court of Appeals has rendered its decision in conflict with an earliest decision of the same court on the same question of law with reference to jurisdiction as to the second cause of action.

4. The Circuit Court of Appeals has so far departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings as to call for an exercise of this Honorable Court's power of supervision.

Wherefore, it is respectfully submitted that this petition for a writ of certiorari should be granted, to review those portions of the judgment of the court below embraced within the questions presented, supra.

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF PETITION.

Jurisdiction.

Section 240(a) of the Judicial Code, as amended by the Act of February 13, 1925 (28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 347).

Judgment of the trial court was entered August 28, 1942 [R. 15].

The opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals was rendered, filed and entered on February 11, 1944 (140 F. (2d) 902) [R. 252-253].

Petition for rehearing was denied April 5, 1944 [R. 253].

Statement of Facts.

The statement of the case containing all that is material to the consideration of the questions presented, with appropriate page references to the printed record, is set forth in the petition, supra.

Statutes Involved.

The statutes involved are Section 33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, Chap. 250, 41 Stat. 1007, 46 U. S. C. A. Sec. 68; Act of April 22, 1908, Chap. 149, Sec. 1, 35 Stat. 65, 45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 51.

Because of their length, relevant portions of the statutes are quoted in the Appendix hereto.

Specifications of Error to Be Urged.

The Circuit Court of Appeals erred:

1. In holding that the law side of the District Court of the United States had jurisdiction to hear and determine either cause of action alleged in the complaint.

2. In holding that the two causes of action for damages were and could be maintained under the provisions of Section 33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, Chap. 250, 41 Stat. 1007, 46 U. S. C. A. Sec. 68 [R. 237].

3. In holding that respondent "based and presented his entire action in the court below upon the Jones Act and in each cause of action relied upon the same negligent acts of his employers [R. 241].

4. In holding that mere ownership of a part of a vessel by the master thereof is sufficient, in and of itself, to support a finding that such master was an employer of respondent at the time of the injury [R. 242-243].

5. In holding that there was no prejudicial error in the introduction into evidence of the wireless message or the various statements made by the doctor at the Island and the Pharmacist's Mate.

6. In holding that respondent's complaint at the time of trial was not at all predicated on the failure of the master to procure an X-ray.

7. In holding that the trial court committed no error in admitting into evidence respondent's testimony with reference to hospital and medical expenses incurred after he had been given a master's certificate entitling him to care and treatment at the facilities of the United States Public Health Service.

8. In holding that the admission into evidence of the doctor's testimony relating to the history of the injury, as well as his writing memorializing it, was not error warranting a reversal of the judgment [R. 247-248].

9. In holding that the doctor's testimony of what respondent told him at the examination, as well as the doctor's written memorial of respondent's statements, consisted of mere repetitious testimony of admitted facts or of incidents which had been otherwise properly received in evidence.

10. In holding that no error was committed in admitting into evidence the testimony of this same doctor with reference to what would be regarded as proper treatment of respondent for the suffered injury.

11. In holding that the court instructed the jury fully and fairly on all the law applicable to the case.

12. In holding that petitioners' proposed instructions were surplusage and were properly not given by the trial judge.

13. In holding that the contention that the instructions to the jury assume that appellants were negligent has no merit.

14. In holding that other assignments of error in the instructions to the jury, not referred to in the Opinion of the Circuit Court of Appeals, are not tenable.

15. In holding that the record reveals ample evidence to support the jury's verdict in both causes of action.

16. In holding that there is no reversible error in the record.

ARGUMENT.

1. The Circuit Court of Appeals Has Decided an Important Question of Federal Law Which Has Not Been, But Should Be, Settled by This Court.

This point involves a consideration of Specifications of Error Nos. 1 and 2; and Nos. 1 and 2 under the heading "Questions Presented", supra.

The Circuit Court of Appeals holds that a suit for damages predicated upon an alleged failure of the master of a fishing vessel to provide medical and hospital care for an injured seaman is a cause of action which is provided for by the Jones Act.

This Honorable Court has not decided this question but should do so, for the reason that the American Merchant Marine is increasing by leaps and bounds and a logical and reasonable construction of the Jones Act is necessary in order to settle uncertainties which have arisen because of the use in many of the decisions of general language when no dispute was presented to the Court which might justify the assumption that the Court deliberately and intentionally selected the particular language used.

An analysis of the Jones Act with reference to the particular point involved in the case at bar requires a discussion of the general maritime law as it existed before the Jones Act and a discussion of that part of the Jones Act which relates to personal injuries. The portion of the Jones Act which provides that, the personal representative of any seaman whose death results from personal injury suffered in the course of his employment may maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury and that in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable, must be laid aside because of the obvious fact that actions for damages for personal injuries and actions for damages by reason of wrongful death are separate and distinct.

The Jones Act, in creating a cause of action for damages for death states that, "in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable. In the case of personal injuries suffered by a seaman in the course of his employment, the Jones Act does not adopt all statutes of the United States codifying the common law rules of liability with reference to employers which existed prior to the adoption of the Federal Employers' Liability Act. The Jones Act merely adopts that portion of the Federal Employers' Liability Act which modifies or extends the theretofore existing common law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees.

At this point it is proper to ascertain what the Employers' Liability Act accomplished.

> "Briefly stated, the effect of the Federal Employers' Liability Act in cases to which it is applicable is to abolish certain defenses which were recognized at common law in favor of an employer when sued by his employee for injuries received in the course of employment. It abolishes the defense embodied in the fellow servant rule and the defense of contributory negligence in all cases where the injury is shown to have been contributed to by the violation by the common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees, and in other cases it establishes the doctrine of comparative negligence, so that the contributory negligence of the employee will not bar a recovery, but merely diminish the damages recoverable. The Act also abrogates the defense of assumption of risk in all cases where the injury was contributed to by the violation by the common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees, and, as amended by the Act of Aug. 11, 1939, in all cases where such injury . . . resulted in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier. Section five prevents the common carrier from exempting itself from liability under the Act by contract, rule, regulation, or other device."

35 American Jurisprudence, 821; Sec. 399.

"Congress took a major step toward modification of the common law barrier against employee recovery in accident suits in the Federal Employers' Liability Act of (June 11) 1906, 34 Stat. 232, c. 3073, repassed with alterations not material in (April 22) 1908, 35 Stat. 65, c. 149, 45 U.S.C.A. §51. This Act, in its principal features, abolished the fellow servant rule, substituted comparative negligence for the strict rule of contributory negligence, and allowed survivors' actions for tort liability."

Tiller v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co., 318 U. S. 54, 62; 87 L. Ed. 610, 615.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act also modified the common law rule with reference to the abatement of actions for damages upon the death of the person injured, as follows:

"Any right of action given by this chapter to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee, and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, but in such cases there shall be only one recovery for the same injury."

45 U. S. C. A., Sec. 59.

The foregoing section is somewhat different from the ordinary Lord Campbell's Act. Ordinarily, and in most of the states, even though an injured person has collected damages for personal injuries during his lifetime, if he dies as a proximate result of the injuries sustained, his heirs or personal representatives may, nevertheless, maintain an action for damages for death and the fact that the injured person has thertofore recovered damages by reason of the personal injuries is no defense to the subsequent action for damages for death. However, pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, if the injured employee has recovered damages, then there is no right of action which shall survive his death. (Seaboard Airline R. Co. v. Oliver, 261 F. 1.)

The foregoing authorities clearly establish that, so far as personal injuries suffered by seamen in the course of their employment are concerned, the sole purpose of Congress in adopting the Jones Act was to remove the defense which had theretofore been available to owners of vessels and employers of seamen in those cases where the personal injury was proximately caused, in whole or in part, by the negligence of any of the officers employed on the vessel or negligence on the part of any of the unlicensed personnel.

That part of the Federal Employers' Liability Act which provides that every common carrier by railroad while engaged in interstate commerce shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce "by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, road bed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment" does not modify or extend any common law right or remedy whatever. The portion of the Act just referred to is merely a codification and continuation of what was theretofore the sole and only basis upon which an employer was liable in damages for personal injuries suffered by an employee in the course of his employment under the common law.

> "It is urged by counsel for defendant that by the enactment of the federal Employers' Liability Act 'new and somewhat different obligations are created.' While the act abolished what is known as the 'fellow-servant doctrine,' there is nothing contained therein which changes the rule as respects the nonassignable duty of the master to exercise reasonable care in providing the servant with reasonably safe tools and appliances with which to perform the work required of him by the master."
> Coal & Coke Ry. Co. v. Deal, 231 F. 604, 608.

In a maritime case which was decided approximately three years before the Jones Act was adopted, and in which case this Honorable Court denied a petition for a writ of certiorari, the court said:

> "The appellee, while in the performance of his duties as assistant engineer of the ship Frank C. Ball, owned by appellant, and while on a voyage from Lorain, Ohio, to Duluth, Minn., was seriously injured in an attempt to start a defective feed pump used for supplying water to the boilers. To recover the damages suffered appellee filed libel in admiralty against the ship; the appellant giving bond to answer the decree. Upon hearing in open court, decree passed for libelant, from which this appeal is taken.

"The ground on which the right to recovery is rested is that the pump was so defective as to render the ship unseaworthy as respects appellee, and to amount to a negligent failure of duty to supply and keep in order the proper appliances appurtenant to the ship—a duty analogous to the ordinary duty of a master to furnish his servant a safe place to work and safe appliances to work with." (Emphasis added.)

Globe S. S. Co. v. Moss, 245 F. 54.

The next question, in view of the nature of the cause of action asserted by the respondent in the case at bar is whether there was ever any duty under the common law which required an employer to furnish medical care in cases where the injury sustained by an employee was not proximately caused, either in whole or in part, by negligence on the part of the employer.

"In the absence, however, of any statutory obligation, the courts administering the common law have long since established the rule applicable to all descriptions of employees except apprentices, that there is no general obligation on the part of an employer to provide medical or surgical attendance as an implied incident of a contract of hiring, and that the employer is not bound to defray the expenses of such attendance upon an employee who falls ill or receives personal injuries in the course of the employment, unless he has expressly or impliedly agreed to do so. . . . The rule is said to apply notwithstanding the illness or disease arises from the negligence of the employer, although the employer is, in a common-law action for negligence, answerable to an employee in damages for all losses proximately resulting, including physician's and surgeon's charges, from the employer's negligence."

35 American Jurisprudence, 536, 537; Sec. 108.

There is nothing in the Federal Employers' Liability Act which places upon common carriers the duty of caring for sick or injured employees. This Honorable Court has held many times that the sole basis of liability, in so far as common carriers are concerned, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, is negligence on the part of the carrier or on the part of a fellow servant, proximately causing the injury complained of. There is therefore no ground upon which to contend that common carriers subject to the provisions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act are under any duty to furnish medical attention or hospital care. It is also difficult to understand how a common carrier actually maintaining a hospital and employing physicians to treat injured employees could be liable under the Federal Employers' Liability Act in the event a surgeon negligently aggravated the original injury or caused a new one in the course of treatment for the reason that no railway employee is entitled to maintain an action pursuant to the Federal Employers' Liability Act unless he suffers his injury while he is employed by the common carrier in interstate or foreign commerce. (Metzger v. Western Md. Ry. Co., 30 F. (2d) 50.)

In the case at bar, the complaint alleges and the answer admits that the injury sustained while respondent was engaged in the act of fishing for tuna "disabled plaintiff from performing any further duties aboard said vessel as a fisherman" [R. 4]. If, as a matter of fact, the plaintiff's original injury was aggravated by a failure on the part of the master of the vessel to provide medical care, it cannot be said that the aggravation was a personal injury suffered "in the course of his employment." It is axiomatic that the Jones Act in no event gives any right of action for any personal injury which is not suffered by a seaman in the course of his employment. Can it be said that a seaman whose injury admittedly disables him from performing any further duties whatever, is nevertheless acting in the course of his employment while receiving or while not receiving medical care? Respondent sustained his original injury while he was acting in the course of his employment as a fisherman. He performed certain emergency duties as a radio operator subsequent to his original injury but the alleged aggravation of the original injury was not sustained while he was acting in the course of his employment as a radio operator.

> "When an employee is off duty the relation of employer and employee is suspended and does not reattach until the employee resumes the master's work."
> Postal Tel. Cable Co. v. I. A. C., 1 California Reports, 2nd Series, at p. 733.

While the foregoing authority is not binding upon this Honorable Court, it is offered for whatever persuasion it exerts in support of petitioners' contention that an injury sustained by a seaman by reason of an alleged negligent omission to furnish him with medical care is not an injury which is sustained in the course of the seaman's employment. Petitioners are aware of the cases holding that any injury sustained by a seaman while he is subject to the call of duty is an injury sustained in the course of his employment but in the case at bar, as petitioners have pointed out, it was alleged and admitted that respondent was disabled from performing any further duties aboard the vessel as a fisherman.

In many of the cases which have been decided by this Honorable Court, it has been said in substance that the election referred to in the Jones Act is an election between the remedy afforded by the general maritime law prior to the adoption of the Jones Act and the remedy afforded by the Jones Act; and not between either of the foregoing and the right to maintenance, care and wages. The last case wherein the court was required to decide a dispute as to the necessity of an election is Pacific S. S. Co. v. Peterson, 278 U. S. 130, 73 L. Ed. 220. Prior to that case, in Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 68 L. Ed. 748, this Honorable Court had said as follows:

> "A more reasonable view, consistent with the spirit and purpose of the statute as a whole, is that the words are used in the sense of 'an action to recover damages for such injuries,'—the emphasis being on the object of the suit rather than the jurisdiction in which it is brought. So we think the reference is to all actions brought to recover compensatory damages under the new rules, as distinguished from the allowances covered by the old rules, usually consisting of wages and the expense of maintenance and cure." (Emphasis added.)

The case of Engel v. Davenport, 271 U. S. 33; 70 L. Ed. 813, approved the prior decision in the case of Panama

R. Co. v. Johnson (supra), and indicated quite clearly that the election was one between maintenance, cure and wages and a suit for damages whether or not the suit for damages was maintained by libel in personam or by action for damages at law. The first serious difficulty arising out of the Jones Act was presented in the case of Pacific S. S. Co. v. Peterson (supra). In this case, the injured seaman had received maintenance and cure as far as medical and surgical attention could reasonably effect a cure and had also received his wages to the end of the voyage prior to the commencement of his suit for damages. In order to retrieve Peterson from his dilemma arising from the fact that he had accepted maintenance, cure and wages which, according to the two prior decisions of this Honorable Court, prevented him from maintaining an action for damages, this Court decided that it did not mean what it had said in the two prior cases but that on the contrary, an injured seaman was entitled in any event, and regardless of any suit for damages, to maintenance, cure and wages. The Court says:

> "The right to recover compensatory damages under the new rule for injuries caused by negligence is, however, an alternative of the right to recover indemnity under the old rules on the ground that the injuries were occasioned by unseaworthiness; and it is between these two inconsistent remedies for an injury, both grounded on tort, that we think an election is to be made under the maritime law as modified by the statute."

This case and others decided since, make reference to the old rules and refer to the Jones Act as a new rule.

A seaman who suffered injury by reason of a negligent failure on the part of the master of a vessel to furnish him with medical attention and hospital care had a cause of action for compensatory damages long before the Jones Act was ever thought of. The master of a vessel has, from time immemorial, been the agent of the owner. In those cases where the employer of the master was not the owner of the vessel but was merely a bare boat charterer, the master was nevertheless the agent of the charterer and represented, as the case may be, the owner or charterer in all dealings with the seamen engaged as such in the navigation of the vessel. Therefore, when the master of a vessel negligently failed to provide medical attention or hospital care for seamen falling ill or suffering injury in the service of the ship, it was a negligent breach of the obligation of the owner or charterer to provide medical attention and hospital care and for such negligent breach of the obligation the owner or charterer was liable in compensatory damages.

In The Iroquois, 194 U. S. 240, 48 L. Ed. 955, the Court says:

> "The duty to provide proper medical treatment and attendance for seamen falling ill or suffering injury in the service of the ship has been imposed upon the shipowners by all maritime nations."

The Iroquois involved a review of a decree of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit which affirmed a decree of the District Court for the Northern District of California in favor of Matthew Bridges for damages by reason of the failure of the master to secure surgical attendance for the treatment of injuries sustained by him while in the performance of his duties.

In The Kenilworth, 144 F. 376, 4 L. R. A. (N. S.) 50, the Court says:

> "Legal responsibility for negligence does not exist in the absence of a duty of care, and upon the scope of the correlative duty in any case the extent of the liability for negligence depends. In this case the duties which it is asserted were not discharged may be stated, in general terms, to be that of the shipowners to provide proper medical treatment and attendants for seamen suffering injury in the service of the ship, and that of the master, where a serious accident occurs, to exercise a reasonable judgment as to putting into the nearest available port; but whether or not these duties have in any instance been adequately discharged is to be determined with reference to the peculiar facts of the particular case." (Petition for writ of certiorari denied April 30, 1906.) (Emphasis added.)

This Honorable Court has very recently decided that under the old rules of liability for injuries sustained as the result of unseaworthiness there is no necessity whatever to allege or prove negligence.

In the case of Mahnich v. Southern S. S. Co., Vol. 88 L. Ed. Adv. Op. 415, the Court says:

> "But later cases in this and other federal courts have followed the ruling of The Osceola, 189 U. S. 158, 47 L. ed. 760, 23 S. Ct. 483, supra, that the exercise of due diligence does not relieve the owner of his obligation to the seaman to furnish adequate appliances. * * *
> "If the owner is liable for furnishing an unseaworthy appliance, even when he is not negligent, a fortiori his obligation is unaffected by the fact that the negligence of the officers of the vessel contributed to its unseaworthiness. It is true that before the Jones Act the owner was, in other respects, not responsible for injuries to a seaman caused by the negligence of officers or members of the crew."

The decision last referred to seems to indicate quite clearly that this Honorable Court is now committed to the rule that if a seaman suffers injury as a result of the unseaworthiness of the vessel or the failure of the owner or the officers of the vessel to supply and keep in reasonably safe condition all appliances appurtenant to the vessel, the seaman is entitled to recover compensatory damages without alleging or proving negligence. It is therefore obvious that such cause of action is not within the provisions of the Jones Act for the reason that there is no liability under the Jones Act in the absence of negligence. If petitioners understand what this Honorable Court has said in the Mahnich case, supra, it is simply this: Mahnich could, prior to the Jones Act and without its aid or the rules provided therein, have maintained an action for compensatory damages against his employer, the Southern S. S. Co., under the general maritime law. If this is so, and if the many cases referring to the requirement of an election between the old rules and the new rule mean what they say, then an anomalous situation is presented. The cases say that the seaman cannot have the benefit of both remedies. He must elect between the right to recover indemnity under the old rules and the right to recover damages under the new rule. How can a man elect between two inconsistent remedies when the same factual background would prevent him from pursuing but one of the two causes of action?

Under the old cases, before the adoption of the Jones Act (The Osceola, 189 U. S. 158; 47 L. Ed. 760), the seaman could not recover any damages whatever, if the unseaworthiness or failure to keep in order the proper appliances appurtenant to the ship was the result of negligence on the part of any of the officers of the ship or of a fellow servant. Does the Jones Act mean that the seaman can elect to recover damages resulting from unseaworthiness of the vessel if the unseaworthiness does not exist when the ship breaks ground but is caused by the negligence of an officer of the ship or a fellow crew member after it is upon the high seas? If the Court gives an affirmative answer to the last question, how could such answer be reconciled with the decision in the Mahnich case which says that the cause of action under the old rule "is unaffected by the fact that the negligence of the officers of the vessel contributed to its unseaworthiness"?

In the Mahnich case the trial court denied damages because the suit had not been commenced within the limitation provided in the Federal Employers' Liability Act. At the time the Jones Act was adopted the time within which an action for damages could be brought, as set forth in the Federal Employers' Liability Act, was two years. That has been amended since so that the time is now extended to three years but did the Jones Act adopt only those portions of the Federal Employers' Liability Act which were in existence at the time of the enactment of the Jones Act or did it also adopt, without saying anything about it, all future amendments thereto?

This Honorable Court says in the Mahnich case:

> "No question is raised with respect to petitioner's right to recover under the Jones Act or his right to the award of maintenance and cure or its adequacy." (88 L. Ed. Ad. Op. at p. 416.)

Therefore, the Court was not deciding or intending to decide that Mahnich could have maintained his action under the provisions of the Jones Act. When the language immediately hereinabove quoted was used is it not true that this Honorable Court was indirectly pointing to the fact that no action for damages can be maintained under the Jones Act if the injury is caused by unseaworthiness or a failure to supply and keep in order the proper appliances appurtenant to the ship, for the reason that the Jones Act did not adopt the codification of the common law basis of liability on the part of an employer who fails to exercise reasonable care in and about furnishing a reasonably safe place to work and reasonably safe tools and appliances?

In the case of Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., 318 U. S. 724, 87 L. Ed. 1107, the Court was considering the question of wages, maintenance and cure. The Court says:

> "Among the most persuasive incidents of the responsibility anciently imposed upon a shipowner for the health and security of sailors was liability for the maintenance and cure of seamen becoming ill or injured during the period of their service. In the United States this obligation has been recognized consistently as an implied provision in contracts of marine employment. Created thus with the contract of employment, the liability, unlike that for indemnity or that later created by the Jones Act, in no sense is predicated on the fault or negligence of the shipowner. Whether by traditional standards he is or is not responsible for the injury or sickness, he is liable for the expense of curing it as an incident of the marine employer-employee relationship. So broad is the shipowner's obligation that negligence or acts short of culpable misconduct on the seaman's part will not relieve him of the responsibility. * * * Conceptions of contributory negligence, the fellow-servant doctrine, and assumption of risk have no place in the liability or defense against it. Only some wilful misbehavior or deliberate act of indiscretion suffices to deprive the seaman of his protection." (Emphasis added.)

This decision uses certain language which is in conflict with the Mahnich case, supra. Liability for indemnity, according to the Mahnich case, in no sense is predicated upon the fault or negligence of the shipowner. Therefore, if the liability for failure to furnish care is subject to the rule set forth in the Aguilar case that the liability for indemnity is in no sense predicated on the fault or negligence of the shipowner, acting through the master, then there could be no liability under the Jones Act for the reason that negligence is the foundation of liability in all actions to which the Jones Act is applicable.

If a seaman cannot deprive himself of his right to medical attention or hospital care by any negligence on his part and if "conceptions of contributory negligence . . . have no place in the liability or defense against it", how can an alleged failure to provide medical attention or hospital care be within the provisions of the Jones Act when in every action which is within that statute contributory negligence is a pro tanto defense?

If injuries sustained as a result of unseaworthiness of a vessel or a failure to supply and keep in order the proper appliances appurtenant to the ship and injuries sustained as a result of the failure on the part of the master of a vessel to furnish reasonably required medical care are put in the same category, then it would not be necessary for the injured seaman to prove negligence at all. His cause of action would be one for compensatory damages arising out of a breach of a contractual duty. The shipowner is an insurer with reference to the seaworthiness of the ship and its appliances, according to the latest decision of this Honorable Court. Is the shipowner also an insurer with reference to injuries sustained as the result of a breach, negligent or otherwise, of the shipowner's duty to furnish medical attention and hospital care?

If suits for damages arising out of a failure to furnish medical attention and hospital care are to be placed in the same category as suits for compensatory damages resulting from unseaworthiness, then it is a certainty that the United States District Court was without jurisdiction of either of the causes of action asserted by the respondent for the reason that there is no allegation or proof with reference to the required diversity of citizenship which must be present in all actions at law in said court.

It has been twice decided by this Honorable Court that the language "jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located", contained in the Jones Act, relates only to venue.

In Panama R. R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 68 L. Ed. 748, the Court says:

> "A reading of the provision now before us with those sections, and in the light of the policy carried into them, makes it reasonably certain that the provision is not intended to affect the general jurisdiction of the district courts as defined in §24, but only to prescribe the venue for actions brought under the new act of which it is a part. No reason why it should have a different purpose has been suggested, nor do we perceive any. Its use of the word 'jurisdiction' seems inapt, and therefore not of special significance. The words 'shall be' are stressed by the defendant, but as they are found also in the earlier provisions which uniformly have been held to relate to venue only, they afford no ground for a distinction."

In Engel v. Davenport, 271 U. S. 33, 70 L. Ed. 813, the Court says:

> "This, as was held in the Panama R. Co. Case, p. 385, was not intended to affect the general jurisdiction of the Federal Courts, but only to prescribe the venue of actions brought in them under the act."

If this Honorable Court correctly held that there is nothing in the Jones Act which has anything to do with the jurisdiction of a United States District Court, then it would seem to follow as a matter of course that no action for damages on the law side of a United States District Court can be maintained under the Jones Act unless there is diversity of citizenship.

The only other possible basis of jurisdiction would be a contention that "the matter in controversy arises under the laws of the United States."

In the case of Gully v. First National Bank, 299 U. S. 109, 114, 81 L. Ed. 70, 73, the Court quotes with approval certain language used in a prior decision as follows:

> "A suit to enforce a right which takes its origin in the laws of the United States is not necessarily, or for that reason alone, one arising under those laws, for a suit does not so arise unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy respecting the validity, construction or effect of such a law, upon the determination of which the result depends."

The validity, construction or effect of the Jones Act could not be submitted to a jury as a question of fact.

The validity, construction or effect of the Jones Act is a question of law. Neither cause of action pleaded in the complaint in the case at bar makes any allegation with reference to the validity or construction or effect of the Jones Act. All that is said in this respect is that "plaintiff elects to maintain this action under the provisions of Section 33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, c. 250, 41 Stat. 1007" [R. 7]. The defendants denied that "the plaintiff has any right to maintain this action under the provisions of Section 33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, c. 250, 41 Stat. 1007" [R. 11].

The Jones Act did not give to a seaman for the first time the right to a trial by jury. By section 9 of the Judiciary Act of (September 24) 1789, 1 Stat. 76, c. 20, 28 U. S. C. A. Sec. 371 (Third) Congress conferred on the district courts exclusive original cognizance of all civil causes of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction saving to suitors, in all cases, the right of a common law remedy, where the common law is competent to give it. One of the incidents of a common law remedy has always been the right to a jury trial. Therefore, every cause of action which existed in favor of a seaman prior to the adoption of the Jones Act carried with it the right on the part of the seaman to sue his employer by libel in personam in a court of admiralty or to commence and maintain suit for damages in a state common law court, with or without a jury, or in the event of a concurrence of jurisdictional amount and diversity of citizenship, in a United States District Court on the law side with or without a jury.

In the case of De Zon v. American President Lines, 318 U. S. 660, 87 L. Ed. 1065, this Honorable Court held that an injured seaman was entitled to the benefit of the provisions of the Jones Act in a suit for damages resulting from the malpractice of a ship's physician in and about the treatment of an injured seaman. This was for the reason that the physician was an employee of the American President Lines and he was on the ship for the purpose of treating injured seamen.

No question was raised in the case of De Zon v. American President Lines with reference to the proposition that De Zon was not injured in the course of his employment as a seaman. The facts set forth in the opinion indicate clearly that De Zon could not have been acting in the course of his employment or subject to the call of duty at the time he claimed the ship's doctor negligently injured him. What this Honorable Court would have said in that case if this point had been suggested or argued cannot be ascertained. Of course, the requirement that the injury be sustained in the course of the seaman's employment is a condition precedent to any liability whatever under the Jones Act but the fact that it could have been the subject of decision or necessarily involved does not mean that this Honorable Court considered or passed upon the question.

As was said in Pacific S. S. Co. v. Peterson (supra), if no question is raised as to a particular part of a statute general statements "ought not to control the judgment in a subsequent suit when the very point is presented for decision or to prevent the determination as an original question of the proper construction of the statute in that particular."

> "Analogous to the principle of obiter dicta is the rule that a decision is not authority upon a point not raised by counsel or referred to in the opinion, even though necessarily involved in the decision. Thus, a decision which fails to note the existence of a statute is not an authority upon the construction of that statute." (Emphasis added.)

7 Cal. Jur. 641, Sec. 46.

Aside from the foregoing remarks, the De Zon case can be readily distinguished from the case at bar for the reason that the Jones Act was adopted for the sole purpose of doing away with the fellow servant doctrine in cases involving injuries to seamen.

> "It would be an anomaly if the fellow servant rule, discredited by the Jones Act as a defense in suits for negligence, were to be resuscitated and extended to suits founded on the warranty of seaworthiness, so as to lower the standard of the owner's duty to furnish safe appliances below that of the land employer." (Emphasis added.) (Mahnich v. Southern S. S. Co., 88 L. Ed. Ad. Op. 414, 418.)

The physician in the De Zon case was a fellow servant. In the case at bar the general maritime law did not deny to a seaman the right to recover compensatory damages arising from a negligent failure of the master of the vessel to provide him with medical attention or hospital care. Therefore, the Jones Act was not adopted for the purpose of discrediting any fellow servant rule in such cases.

The De Zon case is not authority supporting the contention that the Jones Act is applicable to the facts in the case at bar. It involved a case which, under the general maritime law afforded the injured seaman no relief whatever against the shipowner for the reason that the master of the vessel was not charged with any negligent failure to provide ordinary medical attention.

The case of Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Line, 287 U. S. 367, 77 L. Ed. 368, cited by the lower court, lends considerable force to petitioners' contention that the respondent's cause of action is not a right created or enlarged by the Jones Act.

This Honorable Court says:

> "By the general maritime law a seaman is without a remedy against a ship or her owners for injuries in his person, suffered in the line of service, with two exceptions only. * * * A remedy is his also if the injury has been suffered through breach of the duty to provide him with 'maintenance and cure.' * * * If the failure to give maintenance or cure has caused or aggravated an illness, the seaman has his right of action for the injury thus done him, the recovery in such circumstances including not only necessary expenses, but also compensation for the hurt. The Iroquois, 194 U. S. 240, 48 L. Ed. 955, 24 S. Ct. 640, 16 Am. Neg. Rep. 638." (Emphasis added.)
> Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Line, 287 U. S. 367, 370-371, 77 L. Ed. 368, 371.

If we had no Jones Act and the sufficiency of the complaint in the case at bar were tested by the foregoing statement as to the general maritime law, would it state a cause of action? If the answer is, as it must be, in the affirmative, what new or enlarged remedy or right does Mr. Nordyke gain from the Jones Act?

In the same case this Court stated the point of law actually involved as follows:

> "We are to determine whether death resulting from the negligent omission to furnish care or cure is death from personal injury within the meaning of the statute." (Emphasis added.)

This Court was not called upon to determine whether "personal injuries" resulting from a failure to provide medical care were "personal injuries" within the meaning of the Jones Act. What this Court said in its decision must be appraised, understood and interpreted in the light of the question presented for decision. The petitioners are cognizant of what this Court said (287 U. S. 367, at 374-375) about the possibility that "while the seaman was still alive, his cause of action for personal injury created by the statute may have overlapped his cause of action for breach of the maritime duty of maintenance and cure, just as it may have overlapped his cause of action for injury caused through an unseaworthy ship" and "In such circumstances it was his privilege, in so far as the causes of action covered the same ground, to sue indifferently on any one of them. The overlapping is no reason for denying to the words of the statute the breadth of meaning and operation that would normally belong to them, at all events when a consequence of the denial is to withhold any remedy whatever from dependent next of kin." (Emphasis added.)

But this Court was not called upon to decide whether there was a cause of action under the Jones Act which would have been available to Cortes had he lived. Neither was it called upon to decide, as a question of law in issue, whether there was any overlapping of causes of action which Cortes could have sued upon. I respectfully point out that there is no question of any election between the relief afforded and created by the Jones Act on account of death and some remedy afforded by the old rules, for the simple reason that there was no relief afforded by the general maritime (the old) rules on account of death.

It is respectfully contended that the Jones Act should be construed as it was in the first case decided by this Honorable Court wherein it was presented for construction. The statute should be construed in the light of the evil which Congress intended to eradicate. The sole and only benefit which Congress could have given to seamen, regardless of how or when they might be injured, by the adoption of the Jones Act was to give them the single right they did not already have, to wit, a right to recover damages if they suffered injury as a result of the negligence of a fellow crew member. When the Congress said that the seaman was required to make an election, the election referred to was between any type of action for compensatory damages for personal injuries or the acceptance or recovery of maintenance, cure and wages. Legislation contemporary with and prior to the adoption of the Jones Act which in many states gave an injured employee a right to elect whether he would take the benefits of workmen's compensation laws or to sue his employer at common law for damages obviously had some effect upon The Congress. Much confusion has resulted from changing the rule which was originally asserted in the cases of Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 68 L. Ed. 748 and Engel v. Davenport, 271 U. S. 33, 70 L. Ed. 813.

The question of what is meant by "election" as that word is used in the Jones Act must be reconsidered by this Honorable Court at some time. It is contrary to all concepts of justice to permit an injured seaman to have a double recovery. In The Calmar, 303 U. S. 525, 82 L. Ed. 993, this Honorable Court has clearly indicated that it is inclined to extend to any seaman who suffers injury while in the service of the ship a right to demand maintenance and care for the duration of his life if the injury is one which results in a permanent disability. If that is the trend and if a seaman is also entitled to maintain an action for compensatory damages under the Jones Act, he would be making a double recovery. This is so for the reason that one of the elements of damage which may be considered by a jury in arriving at the amount of its verdict is the lost earning capacity of the injured seaman. The element of lost earning capacity is intended, at least in part, to enable the injured seaman to take care of himself in the future and to take the place of what he could have provided for himself if his earning capacity had not been diminished. In other words, if a seaman's earning capacity at the time of an injury is $100 a month, plus the value of his maintenance aboard the ship, which we will assume is $50 per month, then his total earning capacity would be $150 per month. If he is totally disabled and unable to earn anything whatever in the future, the element of lost earning capacity would be arrived at by a jury by resort to a determination of the present value of the future earning capacity during that part of the seaman's expectation of life when it might be reasonably assumed he would retain his ability to perform services as a seaman. If he can have this and maintenance also and if the recovery of maintenance is no obstacle to the recovery of full compensatory damages in an action at law pursuant to the Jones Act, then there will be in each such case a partial double recovery.

The tax-paying public is vitally interested in a correct solution of all of the questions involved and suggested hereinabove for the reason that the War Shipping Administration is now operating and for more than a year last past has been operating and will, at least until the termination of the state of war now existing, continue to operate a vast merchant marine. The United States Government is the employer of all the seamen employed on such vessels. They are entitled to sue the United States Government pursuant to statutes permitting them to do so by recourse to the Suits in Admiralty Act. It is of vital importance that the United States Government know whether an injured seaman is entitled to maintenance, if permanently injured in the service of the ship, for the balance of his natural life and to also recover full and complete compensatory damages, including all of the elements ordinarily included in a verdict in a common law action for damages, in the event the seaman has sustained his injury as a result of negligence on the part of the master, other licensed officers or the unlicensed personnel also employed on such vessels.

This Honorable Court has never decided as a disputed question of law, whether a fisherman or a radio operator-fisherman employed on a fishing boat is a seaman within the meaning of that word as it is used in the Jones Act. The section of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 which is commonly referred to as the Jones Act is a part of the Merchant Marine Act of 1920. One of the objects of Congress in enacting the Merchant Marine Act of 1920 was to benefit merchant marine seamen. The statutes of the United States with reference to the right of certain individuals to have recourse free of charge, to the facilities of the United States Public Health Service restrict the availability of such facilities to "merchant marine seamen." The Surgeon General has adopted an on and off policy with reference to fishermen. Sometimes the directives permit fishermen to enjoy the facilities of the United States Public Health Service and at other times they are denied the right to utilize such facilities upon the ground that they are not merchant marine seamen. If they are not merchant marine seamen, then it is obvious that they are not seamen within the meaning of that word as it is used in the Jones Act, for the simple reason that the Merchant Marine Act was enacted, not for the benefit of mariners in general, but for the benefit of merchant marine seamen.

2. The Circuit Court of Appeals Has Decided a Vital Question in a Way Probably in Conflict With Applicable Decisions of the United States Supreme Court.

The court below states:

> "The sole jurisdictional provision incorporated in the Act is that 'Jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located.' This requirement is a modification of that imposed by the Judiciary Act relating to other suits of a civil nature at common law, and when fulfilled confers on a District Court of the United States the requisite authority to hear and determine an action at law for damages by an injured seaman regardless of his citizenship" [R. 241].

If the foregoing statement is correct, an injured seaman would also be entitled to maintain an action at law for damages in a district court of the United States with a jury furnished at the expense of the tax-payers, even though the amount involved were only five dollars.

This part of the decision of the court below is squarely in the teeth of the decisions of this Honorable Court in Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, 264 U. S. 375, 68 L. Ed. 748 and Engel v. Davenport, 271 U. S. 33, 70 L. Ed. 813, in each of which the Court said that the Jones Act had nothing whatever to do with the general jurisdiction of the district courts and that the language referred to by the court below relates to venue only.

3. The Circuit Court of Appeals Has Rendered Its Decision in Conflict With an Earlier Decision of the Same Court on the Same Question of Law With Reference to Jurisdiction as to the Second Cause of Action.

All parties to this action and the learned trial judge proceeded on the theory that the second cause of action asserted by the petitioner was for maintenance and cure. This is demonstrated by instructions requested by respondent and given by the Court as follows:

> "In his second cause of action plaintiff asks damages for medical attention and maintenance . . ." [R. 222]. (Emphasis added.)

> "In this case, regardless of whether or not you decide that defendant was negligent, you are instructed to award plaintiff maintenance. In other words, a seaman such as plaintiff, who is taken sick in the service of a vessel, is entitled to maintenance from the defendant shipowner. Maintenance is awarded regardless of fault on defendant's part and even if defendant is not at fault. Maintenance is to include such a sum of money as is reasonably necessary to maintain plaintiff until he was able to return to work" [R. 226-227]. (Emphasis added.)

The jury rendered its verdict in favor of the plaintiff on the second count and assessed the damages in the sum of $440.00 [R. 14-15].

In the case of Modin v. Matson Navigation Co., 128 F. (2d) 194 at page 196, the Court says:

> "Thus count 2 stated or attempted to state a claim for maintenance. Upon such a claim, if well founded, relief may be granted either in admiralty or at common law. * * * An action at law upon such a claim may be brought in a State court; if, diverse citizenship exists and the claim is for more than $3,000, it may be brought in a district court of the United States. * * * Here, diverse citizenship was not alleged and, admittedly, did not exist, and the claim was for less than $3,000. Of that claim, therefore, the District Court, sitting as a law court, had no jurisdiction."

4. The Circuit Court of Appeals Has so Far Departed From the Accepted and Usual Course of Judicial Proceedings as to Call for an Exercise of This Honorable Court's Power of Supervision.

The court below holds that the two causes of action were expressly maintained under the provisions of Section 33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, sometimes called the Jones Act [R. 237].

> "The appellee based and presented his entire action in the court below upon the Jones Act and in each cause of action he relied upon the same negligent acts of his employers" [R. 241].

If the court below, in spite of the fact that the record shows the second cause of action was tried on an entirely different theory, is correct, then the petitioners have been deprived of their right to a jury trial for the reason that the trial court directed the jury to find a verdict in favor of respondent on the second cause of action. How could the jury, under such circumstances, have found a verdict in favor of petitioners on the first cause of action? If, as stated by the court below, respondent was proceeding in both causes of action upon the Jones Act and "relied upon the same negligent acts of his employers" [R. 241], the jury (presumably ordinarily intelligent individuals, and presumably aware of the fact that their verdict on two causes of action would have to be consistent if each cause of action required the proof of negligence and proximate causal connection) could do nothing but decide both causes of action in favor of the same party. In this case, however, the trial court prevented the jury from finding a verdict in favor of the petitioners on the second cause of action by telling the jury in legal effect that each and every fact which the respondent was required to prove in order to enable him to recover under the second cause of action had been established as a matter of law.

The court below no doubt handled the matter in the fashion in which it did in order to avoid the rule theretofore stated by it in the case of Modin v. Matson Navigation Co., 128 F. (2d) 194. The accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings has always been that an appellate court will not permit any party to assert one theory in a trial court and another in an appellate court. The same rule should apply to courts as well. When a trial court has tried an issue in accordance with a theory asserted by the plaintiff and agreed to by the defendants, the appellate court should not be permitted to say, even in order to obviate the reversal of a judgment, that the case was tried on some other theory or pursuant to some other rule of law.

The court below states in its opinion that "appellee's complaint at the time of trial was not predicated on the failure of the master to procure the X-ray, but that the vessel and its owners and operators failed to take him, an employee injured in the course of his employment, as soon as possible to a place where proper medical treatment could be obtained; . . ." [R. 245].

The plaintiff's complaint, paragraphs X, XI, XII and XIII [R. 4-5] specifically refer to the message of the Marine Hospital in San Francisco "giving directions to make for the nearest port for X-ray and proper medical attention"; and that "no medical facilities or X-ray equipment were available at said San Cristobal Island"; and to the statement of the pharmacist's mate "that immediate hospitalization and proper X-ray and medical treatment should be given to plaintiff."

It is thus obvious that the respondent, at the outset of the litigation made the question of the absence of an X-ray a material element in his claim of breach of duty.

Turning to the evidence, we find the following references to X-ray in the testimony of respondent and Dr. Alfred E. Gallant:

1. The radio message from the United States Marine Hospital, referring to the X-ray was introduced [R. 56].

2. The doctor at San Cristobal said to respondent, in the presence of the master of the vessel, "The best thing to do was to go somewhere immediately where there was an X-ray, where I could get medical attention" [R. 59].

3. The pharmacist's mate, "said he had no X-ray or material to work with" [R. 62].

4. The first X-ray obtained after the injury was taken in San Diego [R. 66].

5. He was examined later by a doctor at San Cristobal, Galapagos, who applied a splint, but made no attempt to determine the exact nature of the fracture because he had no X-ray facilities [R. 104].

6. He was examined later by a doctor at San Cristobal, Galapagos, who applied a splint but made no attempt to determine the exact nature of the fracture because he had no X-ray equipment [R. 106-107].

7. When the fracture occurs the taking of X-rays at once is standard practice today or malpractice is in the offing [R. 114].

8. If the injury had been X-rayed and properly treated three days after it occurred there would not have been any permanent disability [R. 116-117].

9. The ideal treatment is if X-rays are available to take pictures, and if not available immediately, to get them as soon as possible [R. 117-118].

Petitioners cannot understand how the court below could, in the face of the record in this case, say that "appellee's complaint at the time of trial was not predicated on the failure of the master to procure the X-rays". The record demonstrates that, from the time the complaint was filed until the last testimony was introduced by the respondent, one of his principal complaints was the fact that no X-ray had been taken until he got to San Diego.

One of the specifications of error was "that there is no evidence of any proximate causal connection between any alleged failure on the part of the defendants, or either of them, to exercise ordinary care in or about providing care and the condition of plaintiff's arm as it existed at the time of trial" [R. 39].

The gravamen of Dr. Gallant's testimony is that proper medical care requires the taking of an X-ray just as soon as it is reasonably possible to get one. Dr. Gallant did not testify with reference to anything which could or should have been done for the respondent in addition to what was done, with the sole exception of the omitted X-ray. Dr. Gallant's testimony does not prove or tend to prove that the doctor at San Cristobal, Galapagos Island did not properly diagnose, properly reduce, and properly splint the respondent's fractured wrist. Dr. Gallant's testimony does not prove or tend to prove that the pharmacist's mate did not give to the respondent exactly that kind of surgical care which would have been given to respondent by any doctor anywhere in the world. The jury could not have used Dr. Gallant's testimony as the basis of a finding of negligence on the part of the master with the sole exception of the failure to obtain the X-ray.

In view of the fact that the complete record of what was done for Mr. Nordyke and the manner in which it was done is contained in the petition herein, it is the contention of petitioners that the sole and only basis upon which the jury could have made a finding that the master of the vessel negligently failed to perform his duty was the failure to obtain the X-ray.

It is a presumption of law, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the doctor at San Cristobal was a skillful and competent physician and that he did everything for respondent which could have been done by any ordinarily competent or ordinarily skillful physician anywhere in the world. The same may be said with reference to the pharmacist's mate in his capacity, as such. The fact that the reduction of the fracture was actually accomplished and that the treatment was clearly sufficient is established beyond all peradventure of doubt by the testimony of Dr. William Edwin McLellan, commanding officer of the United States Public Health Service in the San Diego district. His testimony has been set forth in the petition and it shows that when the respondent got to San Diego there was nothing whatever wrong with him. This expert testimony is uncontradicted.

Petitioners therefore contend that the Circuit Court of Appeals has so far departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings as to call for an exercise of this Honorable Court's power of supervision for the simple reason that the court below, in order to avoid the necessity of reversing the judgment because of the reception in evidence of the statements of the doctor at San Cristobal, the pharmacist's mate and the oral and written remarks of Dr. Gallant, which latter were based upon the hearsay statements of respondent, has stated that respondent's "complaint at the time of trial was not predicated on the failure of the master to procure the X-ray" [R. 245].

In the case of Nashville, C. & St. L. Ry. Co. v. York, 127 F (2d) 606, 610-612, it is held that the admission of testimony like that of Dr. Gallant is reversible error because it is incompetent.

The statements contained in the radio message sent by the Marine Hospital in San Francisco, made by the doctor at San Cristobal and by the pharmacist's mate, with reference to the necessity of obtaining an X-ray, were not competent for proof of any duty on the part of the master to obtain an X-ray or that a failure to obtain an X-ray was a negligent breach of duty.

The only purpose which an X-ray serves is to indicate the nature of a bony injury. If the injury is known, the function of an X-ray ceases. An X-ray is not used for the purpose of treating fractures. It is merely used for the purpose of diagnosing whether there is or is not a fracture.

Respondent's expert witness testified that in order for a doctor to tell from a surgical standpoint what the exact injury was he would have to see either the patient or an X-ray exhibiting the bony condition [R. 119].

The evidence with reference to the failure to obtain an X-ray was most prejudicial for the reason that it gave the jury the definite impression that there had been a serious breach of duty. There is no proof in the record showing what an X-ray taken within the time specified by Dr. Gallant would have shown with reference to plaintiff's fracture. There is an entire absence of any evidence showing the slightest proximate causal connection between the failure to obtain an X-ray and the condition found and testified to by Dr. Gallant.

Another instance in which the court below has departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings is that it has held, in legal effect, that the master was negligent for the sole reason that he did not procure medical attention at some geographical location different from those at which medical care was furnished. The lower court has assumed, without any reference to any evidence which would justify the assumption, that the doctor at San Cristobal did not properly diagnose and reduce the fracture. It has also assumed, without referring to any evidence justifying the assumption, that the pharmacist's mate did not properly diagnose and properly splint the fracture. Dr. McLellan's testimony is not referred to at all. Yet his expert evidence proves beyond all reasonable doubt that the respondent received all the medical care and attention which his injury required.

Respondent's physical condition at the time he arrived in San Diego was a matter which was properly the subject of expert testimony. Dr. McLellan's opinion testimony was binding and conclusive.

In the case of Arais v. Kalensnikoff, 10 California Reports (2d) 428, 433, 74 Pac. (2d) 1043, the court states that the rule appears to be that whenever the subject under consideration is one within the knowledge of experts only, and is not within the common knowledge of laymen, the expert evidence is conclusive upon the question in issue.

The lower court has approved the instructions given by the learned trial judge at the request of the respondent as follows:

1. "The master, vessel and its owners are legally obliged to furnish proper medical care to the injured seaman within the earliest possible time. . . ." [R. 226].

2. "If you find from all the facts and circumstances in this case that said Francisco was negligent in failing to provide plaintiff with proper medical care, . . . the defendant company is liable for the consequences of Francisco's negligence" [R. 226].

The point involved here is that there is no requirement that the master or the vessel or its owners furnish proper medical care, the only requirement being that reasonable care be exercised to furnish means of cure, restricted to ordinary medical care and attention. These objections were clearly pointed out to the learned trial judge in the manner and at the time required by law [R. 215-216].

Petitioners know that several decisions have said that "cure" is used in its original meaning of care "and means proper care of the injured seaman." This Honorable Court used the same language in The Iroquois (supra), and the Circuit Court of Appeals used it in The Kenilworth (supra). However, the word was not selected and used by any court as the applicable adjective to define the type of medical care which must be provided until the dispute arose in the case at bar. No disputed issue as to the propriety of so defining the contractual duty has been presented to and decided by any court until now.

In The Bouker No. 2, 241 Fed. 831, 835, cited many times by this Honorable Court, cure was referred to as "the ordinary medical assistance and treatment in case of injury or acute disease, for a reasonable time" and the "expense of effecting a cure by ordinary medical means. This does not include extraordinary medical treatment . . ." (Emphasis added.)

The use of the adjective "proper" in the instructions given by the learned trial judge was particularly prejudicial in the case at bar because of the testimony of Dr. Gallant that if the injury were properly treated—put it all in the word "treatment"—I don't think there would have been any permanent disability [R. 117].

In the case of Rasmussen v. Shickle, 4 Cal. App. Rep. (2d) 426, 41 Pac. (2d) 184, the court says:

> "Aside from the inherent weakness manifest in the answer to establish negligence, proof of lack of proper care and skill in a given treatment or failure to treat in a certain way is not sufficient to establish a case of malpractice on the part of a physician. The law does not require that the advice, instructions and treatment given by a physician to a patient shall be at all events proper, or that his treatment should be such as to attain an approximate perfect result. It requires only, first, that he shall have the degree of learning and skill ordinarily possessed by physicians of good standing practicing in that locality, and, second, that he shall exercise reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in treating the patient and in applying such learning and skill to the case. Proper treatment implies that no error shall be committed thereby, that an approximate perfect result will be produced, and that such result is guaranteed, whereas the law only demands that the physician use reasonable care to attain such approximate perfection." (Emphasis added.)

The foregoing authority demonstrates that there is no obligation on the part of a physician and surgeon, in and about the treatment of a patient, to furnish proper care. If there is no obligation on the part of a physician or surgeon, undertaking the treatment of a patient, to furnish proper care, petitioners cannot understand why the master of a vessel, not possessing the skill or judgment of a physician or surgeon, is obliged to furnish proper medical care. All that is required is that the master exercise ordinary care in and about furnishing ordinary medical means of cure. The instructions took the case far beyond the legal standard of care and in effect made the question of negligence on the part of the master dependent upon whether the care he furnished was "proper medical care" rather than permitting the jury to decide as a question of fact whether the master was guilty of any negligence consisting of a failure, if any, to furnish ordinary medical care.

The trial court, at the request of respondent, instructed the jury as follows:

> "As I have stated, the plaintiff claims in this case that his present condition is due to, and has been caused by the failure and neglect of the defendant to provide him with adequate and competent medical and hospital services at the earliest reasonable opportunity. If the plaintiff has proved to your satisfaction, and by a preponderance of the evidence, under all the facts and circumstances of the case, that the defendant failed to supply him with proper medical care and attention at the earliest reasonable opportunity and that as a result thereof the use and strength of his hand and wrist have been lost in whole or in part due to such negligent failure on the part of the defendant, the plaintiff has made out a case and is entitled as a matter of law to damages from the defendant" [R. 225-226].

At the proper time and place, as required by law, petitioners objected to this instruction as follows:

"First, the language assumes as a fact that there has been a failure and neglect of the defendant to provide the plaintiff with adequate and competent medical and hospital service at the earliest reasonable opportunity; secondly, the jury is not left to find whether there has been a failure or neglect; and, third, there is no requirement that the defendants, or either of them, furnish the plaintiff with adequate and competent or adequate or competent hospital services, and whether the plaintiff required any kind of medical services, or any hospital services whatever, would be a question of fact for the jury, and this instruction invades the province of the jury, and states as a positive rule that the defendant was required to furnish hospital services. Fourth, there is no requirement that anything excepting a means of cure be provided, and there is no requirement that anything other than ordinary medical service be furnished.

"The defendants object to the portion of the instruction which permits the jury to render a verdict against the defendants in the event the defendants fail to supply him with proper medical care and attention at the earliest reasonable opportunity. That particular language in the instruction is subject to the objection that there has been testimony here by an orthopedic specialist given to the jury as a possible standard of the care required, and the instruction should be limited in every instance to a requirement that reasonable care be used in order to furnish ordinary medical care and attention" [R. 213-214]. (Emphasis added.)

The instruction last referred to states the claim of the respondent to the effect that his present condition is due to and has been caused by an actual failure and neglect on the part of defendant to provide him with adequate and competent medical and hospital services. There is no evidence in the case which indicates that the respondent required any hospital service at all. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the defendant failed to supply the plaintiff with proper medical care and attention at the earliest reasonable opportunity would not, as a matter of law, amount to a negligent failure on the part of the defendant. Yet this instruction clearly told the jury that if the defendant failed in this respect such failure was a negligent failure. The instruction also states that the contractual duty requires the master to select, at his peril, a doctor who is unqualifiedly competent and that the treatment given be unqualifiedly adequate. There is no such duty. This Honorable Court should not approve the action of the lower court in stating that there is any such duty.

The instruction should have been worded as follows: If the plaintiff has proved by a preponderance of evidence that the master of the vessel negligently failed to provide the plaintiff with ordinary medical care and attention at the earliest reasonable opportunity and that as a proximate result thereof the use and strength of his hand and wrist have been lost, in whole or in part, due to such, if any, negligent failure on the part of the master of the vessel, the plaintiff has made out a case and is entitled as a matter of law to damages from the defendant employer.

The instruction as given is quoted in the opinion of the lower court [R. 251] with the statement that the jury was properly charged in that respect.

If the judgment of the lower court is not reviewed by this Honorable Court the law with reference to the obligation of shipowners with reference to medical care and attention will undergo a material change.

The definition of the adjective "proper" in Webster's New International Dictionary, Second Edition, precludes any approval by this Honorable Court of a decision which fastens upon shipowners, as a matter of law, the duty to provide an injured seaman with "proper medical care and attention."

One of the definitions given is "strictly pertinent or applicable; exact, correct; . . ." Another is "fine; excellent; . . ."

If the care must also be competent and adequate, masters of vessels will be required to have sufficient medical and surgical knowledge to enable them to examine the doctors as to their competency.

Conclusion.

It is respectfully submitted that a writ of certiorari should be issued.

Dated, Los Angeles, California, April 24th, 1944.

LASHER B. GALLAGHER,
Attorney for Petitioners.

APPENDIX.

The statutes involved are as follows:

RECOVERY FOR INJURY TO OR DEATH OF SEAMAN. Any seaman who shall suffer personal injury in the course of his employment may, at his election, maintain an action for damages at law, with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States modifying or extending the common-law right or remedy in cases of personal injury to railway employees shall apply; and in case of the death of any seaman as a result of any such personal injury the personal representative of such seaman may maintain an action for damages at law with the right of trial by jury, and in such action all statutes of the United States conferring or regulating the right of action for death in the case of railway employees shall be applicable. Jurisdiction in such actions shall be under the court of the district in which the defendant employer resides or in which his principal office is located. (Mar. 4, 1915, c. 153, §20, 38 Stat. 1185; June 5, 1920, c. 250, §33, 41 Stat. 1007.)

46 U. S. C. A. Sec. 688.

LIABILITY OF COMMON CARRIERS BY RAILROAD, IN INTERSTATE OR FOREIGN COMMERCE, FOR INJURIES TO EMPLOYEES FROM NEGLIGENCE. Every common carrier by railroad while engaging in commerce between any of the several States or Territories, or between any of the States and Territories, or between the District of Columbia and any of the States or Territories, or between the District of Columbia or any of the States or Territories and any foreign nation or nations, shall be liable in damages to any person suffering injury while he is employed by such carrier in such commerce, or, in case of the death of such employee, to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee; and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, for such injury or death resulting in whole or in part from the negligence of any of the officers, agents, or employees of such carrier, or by reason of any defect or insufficiency, due to its negligence, in its cars, engines, appliances, machinery, track, roadbed, works, boats, wharves, or other equipment. (Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, §1, 35 Stat. 65.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 51.

CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE; DIMINUTION OF DAMAGES. In all actions hereafter brought against any such common carrier by railroad under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this chapter to recover damages for personal injuries to an employee, or where such injuries have resulted in his death, the fact that the employee may have been guilty of contributory negligence shall not bar a recovery, but the damages shall be diminished by the jury in proportion to the amount of negligence attributable to such employee: Provided, That no such employee who may be injured or killed shall be held to have been guilty of contributory negligence in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee. (Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, §3, 35 Stat. 66.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 53.

ASSUMPTION OF RISKS OF EMPLOYMENT. In any action brought against any common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this chapter to recover damages for injuries to, or the death of, any of its employees, such employee shall not be held to have assumed the risks of his employment in any case where the violation by such common carrier of any statute enacted for the safety of employees contributed to the injury or death of such employee. (Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, §4, 35 Stat. 66.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 54.

CONTRACT, RULE, REGULATION, OR DEVICE EXEMPTING FROM LIABILITY; SET-OFF. Any contract, rule, regulation, or device whatsoever, the purpose or intent of which shall be to enable any common carrier to exempt itself from any liability created by this chapter, shall to that extent be void: Provided, That in any action brought against any such common carrier under or by virtue of any of the provisions of this chapter, such common carrier may set off therein any sum it has contributed or paid to any insurance, relief benefit, or indemnity that may have been paid to the injured employee or the person entitled thereto on account of the injury or death for which said action was brought. (Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, §5, 35 Stat. 66.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 55.

ACTIONS; LIMITATION; CONCURRENT JURISDICTION OF COURTS; REMOVAL OF CASE IN STATE COURT. No action shall be maintained under this chapter unless commenced within two years from the day the cause of action accrued.

Under this chapter an action may be brought in a district court of the United States, in the district of the residence of the defendant, or in which the cause of action arose, or in which the defendant shall be doing business at the time of commencing such action. The jurisdiction of the courts of the United States under this chapter shall be concurrent with that of the courts of the several States, and no case arising under this chapter and brought in any State court of competent jurisdiction shall be removed to any court of the United States. (Apr. 22, 1908, c. 149, §6, 35 Stat. 66; Apr. 5, 1910, c. 143, §1, 36 Stat. 291.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 56.

SURVIVAL OF RIGHT OF ACTION OF PERSON INJURED. Any right of action given by this chapter to a person suffering injury shall survive to his or her personal representative, for the benefit of the surviving widow or husband and children of such employee, and, if none, then of such employee's parents; and, if none, then of the next of kin dependent upon such employee, but in such cases there shall be only one recovery for the same injury. (Apr. 5, 1910, c. 143, §2, 36 Stat. 291.)

45 U. S. C. A. Sec. 59.

DUTIES, FUNDS, AND PROPERTY OF PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE; CARE OF SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN. The care of sick and disabled seamen and all other duties formerly required by law to be performed by the Marine Hospital Service shall be performed by the Public Health Service, and all funds, properties, and rights pertaining to said Mairne Hospital Service shall be available for use for like purposes and in like manner by the Public Health Service. (July 1, 1902, c. 1370, §1, 32 Stat. 712; Aug. 14, 1912, c. 288, §1, 37 Stat. 309.)

Statement of the Case 1

Argument 5

I.

The question of federal law involved in this case has been settled heretofore by this court, and the decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals follows and applies the decisions of this court 5

II.

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals is not in conflict with applicable decisions of this court 14

III.

The Circuit Court of Appeals has not decided contrary to its earlier decision on jurisdiction with regard to the second cause of action 16

IV.

The Circuit Court of Appeals has not departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings and this is not a case which calls for an exercise of this court's power of supervision 18

V.

The fact that counsel for petitioners has another case pending on certiorari (Luksich v. Misetich) is no basis for granting certiorari in this case 21

No. 959

VAN CAMP SEA FOOD CO., INC. (a corporation), and ANTONIO FRANCISCO, Petitioners,

vs.

ROBERT A. NORDYKE,
Respondent.

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT
in Opposition to Petition for a Writ of Certiorari.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

Respondent Robert Nordyke entered the employ of petitioners on August 1, 1941 as a radio-operator fisherman aboard their fishing vessel the "Madereinse" for a tuna fishing expedition in Central American Pacific waters.

On September 14, 1941 while engaged in fishing he was injured when "a tuna hit the line it threw my arm up against the rail". (R. p. 47.) Respondent's injury was a fracture of his right wrist and unquestionably suffered "in the service of the ship" as that term is used and understood.

Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co. (1943), 318 U. S. 724, 87 L. Ed. 1107, 63 S. Ct. 930, 1943 A.M.C. 451;

O'Donnell v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co. (1943), 318 U. S. 36, 87 L. Ed. 596, 63 S. Ct. 488, 1943 A.M.C. 149;

Sundberg v. Washington Fish & Oyster Co. (C.C.A. 9, 1943), 138 Fed. (2d) 801.

Respondent reported the injury at once to the master. There were no doctor or medical facilities aboard other than some insignificant first aid supplies. The master jerked at the wrist but didn't help it. It could well be found that such attempted treatment made the wrist worse. Respondent was in great pain, which fact was communicated to the master.

Respondent radioed the United States Marine Hospital at San Francisco a description of the injury and asked for advice. The hospital radioed the master that the description was that of an imperfect broken wrist bone, gave instructions for treatment, and advised the master to "make for the nearest port for X-ray and proper medical care". (R. p. 55.) Respondent read and handed the message to the master. The hospital's instructions were a statement of the law of the sea, and if the master did not know previously what he should do, he was told. The master denied receiving such a telegram (R. p. 205) although it is listed on the ship's log in an exhibit offered for identification by petitioners themselves. (R. p. 90.) The jury obviously did not believe the master.

Despite the fact that respondent was badly hurt and in obvious pain, and there were no means to give medical care and treatment aboard (and no treatment was given), the petitioners' vessel continued to fish for two days before attempting to get medical care and attention for respondent. The vessel then went to San Cristobal, Ecuador, where it had to go anyhow for inspection. (R. p. 207.) There respondent saw a doctor who said the wrist was broken but said he did not have facilities to take care of respondent and advised the master who was present to take respondent "somewhere immediately where there was an X-ray where respondent could get medical attention". (R. p. 59.) The master failed to follow this advice or to get proper medical attention for respondent.

The vessel continued to fish, and several days later came upon an American destroyer. The pharmacist's mate of that vessel came aboard the fishing boat and looked at respondent's wrist, told respondent and the master that it was broken, and told the master to take respondent to Panama or some near port for medical care and attention, and that if the wrist were not attended to for about two weeks it would set and cause further complications. (R. pp. 62-64.)

The master asked the destroyer whether they would take respondent to Panama, but the destroyer could not do so. Apparently Captain Francisco recognized his duty, even if he would not perform it. The master failed to follow the pharmacist mate's advice, or to get care and proper medical attention for respondent.

On October 10, 1941 the fishing boat reached San Diego. Respondent there went to the Marine Hospital where he found the doctors unable to treat him for several days (R. pp. 154-156) so he went to his home in San Jose where he obtained proper medical care and treatment for the first time. A full month had elapsed from the time of the injury until respondent obtained proper medical care and treatment, and then he obtained it at his own initiative and expense. But the damage was done, and a part of the bone in respondent's right wrist had to be removed with consequent serious limitation of motion in and permanent disability to respondent's wrist. (R. pp. 109-110.) Petitioners' failure to provide respondent with proper medical care caused the result which occurred.

Respondent subsequently brought an action against petitioners in the United States District Court for the Southern District of California, Central Division. Respondent's case was based on the Jones Act (§33 of the Act of June 5, 1920, 41 Stat. 1007, 46 U.S.C.A. §688) and was stated in two counts: the first, for compensatory damages based on petitioners' negligent failure to provide respondent with proper medical care and attention thereby causing him to suffer personal injury, namely, a permanent disability and added pain and suffering; and the second, for maintenance, cure and wages.

Respondent proved his case to the jury's satisfaction which returned a verdict in his favor for $3750.00 on the first cause of action, and $440.00 on the second cause of action. (R. p. 13.) Petitioners appealed to the United States Circuit Court for the Ninth Circuit which found the verdict and judgment entered thereon proper, supported by the law and the evidence, and affirmed. (R. pp. 236-253.)

Petitioners now seek certiorari.

ARGUMENT.

I.

THE QUESTION OF FEDERAL LAW INVOLVED IN THIS CASE HAS BEEN SETTLED HERETOFORE BY THIS COURT, AND THE DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS FOLLOWS AND APPLIES THE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT.

The question involved is whether the failure of a shipowner to furnish proper medical care to a seaman injured in the service of its ship gives rise to an action for compensatory damages under the Jones Act.

That question has been twice answered affirmatively in Jones Act cases,

Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Lines (1932), 287 U. S. 367, 77 L. Ed. 368, 53 S. Ct. 173;

DeZon v. American President Lines (1943), 318 U. S. 660, 87 L. Ed. 1065, 63 S. Ct. 814, 1943 A.M.C. 483; and years before that in the same way under the general maritime law in

The Iroquois (1904), 194 U. S. 240, 48 L. Ed. 955, 24 S. Ct. 640.

Petitioners argue that there is no duty on the part of a shipowner to furnish proper medical care to a seaman injured in the service of its ship and that the cases just cited do not lay down the principles which respondent asserts.

Respondent, of course, contends that petitioners' position in each respect is wrong. A review of the applicable decisions support respondent's contentions.

Even before the passage of the Jones Act, and for hundreds of years, it has been the law of the sea that a seaman injured in the service of a vessel must be cured at the vessel's expense, and that where a seaman is sick or hurt, and the circumstances of the case require it, a vessel must put in to the nearest port where medical attention can be had, or take other means even at the cost of a week's delay to get medical attention for the seaman.

The Iroquois, supra;

The Osceola (1903), 189 U. S. 158, 47 L. Ed. 760, 23 S. Ct. 483;

Harden v. Gordon (1823), 2 Mason 541, 11 Fed. Cas. No. 6047;

Reed v. Canfield (1832), 1 Sumn. 195, 20 Fed. Cas. No. 11641;

Unica v. United States (U.S.D.C., Ala., 1923), 1923 A.M.C. 455;

Persson v. Gulf Refining Co. (N.Y., 1930), 1934 A.M.C. 559.

The duty to provide proper medical care imposed under the old maritime law has been carried over to the administration of the Jones Act, and failure to render proper medical care resulting in injury to a seaman is a personal injury under the act giving rise to an action for damages.

Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Lines, Inc., supra;
DeZon v. American President Lines, supra;
Anelich v. "The Arizona" (1935), 183 Wash. 467, 49 Pac. (2d) 3, 1935 A.M.C. 1332 (affirmed 298 U. S. 110, 80 L. Ed. 1075, 56 S. Ct. 707);
Nicolaisen v. Swayne & Holt, Ltd. (C.C.A. 5, 1934), 70 Fed. (2d) 602;
Cf. Aguilar v. Standard Oil Co., supra.

Nor need a seaman request medical care in order to receive it.

Nahmeh v. United States (U.S.D.C., N.Y., 1926), 1926 A.M.C. 1150.

The applicable principles on medical care have been most recently enunciated by this Court in the DeZon case, supra, 318 U. S. at page 667:

" 'The duty to provide proper medical treatment and attendance for seamen falling ill or suffering injury in the service of the ship has been imposed upon the shipowners by all maritime nations.' The Iroquois, 194 U. S. 240, 241-242. When a seaman becomes committed to the service of a ship the maritime law annexes a duty that no private agreement is competent to abrogate, and the ship is committed to the maintenance and cure of the seaman for illness or injury during the period of the voyage, and in some cases for a period thereafter. This duty does not depend upon fault. It is no merely formal obligation and it admits of no merely perfunctory discharge.

> Its measure depends upon the circumstances of each case—the seriousness of the injury or illness and the availability of aid. Although there may be no duty to the seaman to carry a physician, the circumstances may be such as to require reasonable measures to get him to one, as by turning back, putting into the nearest port although not one of call, hailing a passing ship, or taking other measures of considerable cost in time and money. Failure to furnish such care, even at the cost of a week's delay, has been held by this Court to be a basis for damages." (Italics ours.)

In the cited case, this Court held that the negligence of a ship's doctor in treating an injured seaman was actionable against the shipowner under the Jones Act.

And in the leading case of Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Lines, supra, the rule is declared, 287 U. S. at page 371:

> "If the failure to give maintenance or cure has caused or aggravated an illness, the seaman has his right of action for the injury done him, the recovery in such circumstances including not only necessary expenses, but also compensation for the hurt."
> Cf. "The Korea Maru" (C.C.A. 9, 1918), 254 Fed. 398.

Contrary to petitioners' assertions, in both the DeZon and Cortes cases, supra, the seamen were injured while in the service of their respective ships, and the principles enunciated by this Court in those cases were obviously based on such facts. In the DeZon case, the seaman was injured by getting a chip of paint in his eye while working in the engine room of the vessel, and contended that he lost the sight of his eye because the ship's doctor failed to leave him at Honolulu where the ship was at the time in order to get proper medical attention which was available there but not on the ship. The seaman claimed that failure to provide such proper medical care resulting in the loss of the eye was a personal injury within the contemplation of the Jones Act. This Court agreed with this principle of law.

In the Cortes case, supra, the seaman contracted pneumonia while in the ship's service, and his administrator contended that the seaman's subsequent death from pneumonia resulted from the shipowner's failure to provide proper medical care, a personal injury under the Jones Act.

In both of these cases this Court held that the failure to render medical care resulting in injury to the seaman was a personal injury within the meaning of the Jones Act. These decisions were in line with that in The Iroquois, supra, where the master of the vessel unduly delayed getting a seaman who broke his leg in the ship's service to a port for medical treatment with the result that the seaman's leg had to be amputated, a personal injury in the eyes of the general maritime law.

It follows that the question which petitioners contend has not been decided by this Court has, in fact, been decided several times (unfavorably to petitioners' views) and the Circuit Court has followed those decisions.

Not content with its unwillingness to accept the law on the point just discussed, petitioners next want this Court to review and change the decisions which give to seamen two independent and cumulative rights, one for compensatory damages where there is negligence (under the Jones Act) and another for maintenance, wages, and cure (under the general maritime law). There is nothing inconsistent or allowing a double recovery in these rights, despite petitioners' claim that the seaman must be required to make an election. There is a difference between a double recovery and a double remedy. Existence of the latter does not of itself allow the former.

The Jones Act right is based on negligence. The damages that may be awarded are those commonly recognized as recoverable in a negligence case, and include general damages for the hurt, and special damages for actual wages lost, medical expenses incurred, and so forth.

The other right a seaman has is to recover maintenance, wages (until the end of the voyage) and cure where he is injured in the ship's service, even though there is no negligence. This is the rule of The Osceola, supra. An action for damages under the Jones Act would not necessarily include these latter items (although it could), and a maintenance, wages, and cure recovery would certainly not include a recovery of damages.

The late Justice Cardozo ably explained the point which troubles petitioners in the Cortes case, supra, 287 U. S. at pages 374-375:

"While the seaman was still alive, his cause of action for personal injury created by the statute (Jones Act) may have overlapped his cause of action for breach of the maritime duty of maintenance and cure, just as it may have overlapped his cause of action for injury caused through an unseaworthy ship. (Citing cases.) In such circumstances it was his privilege, insofar as the causes of action covered the same ground, to sue indifferently on any one of them. The overlapping is no reason for denying to the words of the statute the breadth of meaning and operation that would normally belong to them, at all events when a consequence of the denial is to withhold any remedy whatever from dependent next of kin. A double remedy during life is not without a rational office if the effect of the duplication is to carry the remedy forward for others after death. The argument for the respondent imputes to the lawmakers a subtlety of discrimination which they would probably disclaim." (Our emphasis.)

These comments are peculiarly appropriate to the argument of petitioners here which is reminiscent of respondent's argument in the Cortes case.

The election that petitioners speak about which a seaman must make is between his Jones Act action based on negligence, and his maritime action based on unseaworthiness. There he must choose which course he will pursue to recover damages, but whichever he chooses, he has his independent and cumulative right to maintenance, wages and cure. These principles are so well settled and commonly accepted and in accord with the traditionally liberal view entertained toward seamen that they certainly should not serve as a basis for certiorari in this case.

Pacific S. S. Co. v. Peterson (1928), 278 U. S. 130, 73 L. Ed. 220, 49 S. Ct. 75, 1928 A.M.C. 1932.

This Court said, 278 U. S. page 137:

"Claims for maintenance, cure and wages, and for indemnity for injuries occasioned by unseaworthiness, may be demanded and recovered in the same proceeding."

"Thus the election required by the Jones Act was whether a seaman would proceed under the old admiralty remedy for unseaworthiness, or under the new rules for negligence. In any event, he could join his claim for maintenance, cure and wages with his action for compensatory damages. That is what plaintiff has done in this case."

And that is what plaintiff-respondent has done in this case. Respondent made no double recovery, nor does he propose to. He joined all his rights in one action, and made one recovery under the rule of the Peterson case, just cited, and the Cortes case, supra. Petitioners' statements concerning the fact that the Government is operating numerous vessels and seamen injured may bring suits for maintenance and damages separately and the Government wants to know whether they can do this are inappropriate here. While petitioners' solicitude for the Government may be appreciated, those issues are not presented nor the parties before the Court in this case. The questions of what rights an injured seaman has to damages and maintenance, and what election he is required to make, have long since been decided by this Court, and have been followed by State and Federal Courts alike throughout the country. Nor have petitioners shown any reason for a reexamination or reconsideration of those decisions.

Finally, petitioners' point that this Court should grant certiorari to determine whether a fisherman is a seaman within the meaning of the Jones Act is without merit. That a fisherman is a seaman within the Jones Act has been the accepted rule for years,

Nolan v. General Seafoods Corp. (C.C.A. 1, 1940), 112 Fed. (2d) 515;

Sundberg v. Washington Fish & Oyster Co., supra;

Osland v. Star Fish & Oyster Co. (C.C.A. 5, 1939), 107 Fed. (2d) 113, 1940 A.M.C. 127.

A longshoreman engaged in work in connection with a vessel has been held by this Court to be a seaman within the meaning of the Jones Act, International Stevedoring Co. v. Haverty (1926), 272 U. S. 50, 71 L. Ed. 157, 47 S. Ct. 19.

In the O'Donnell case, supra, this Court said:

"The term 'seaman' has been interpreted to embrace those employed on a vessel in rendering services customarily performed by seamen."

Cf. Norton v. Warner Co. (October Term 1943, No. 362), ... U. S. .....

Fishermen, besides fishing, take the vessel to the fishing grounds and return. They do all those things necessary to the navigation and preservation of the vessel. They are the "seamen" of the fishing vessel. They are so commonly accepted as seamen that the argument made by petitioners that they are not is rarely, if ever, made. Furthermore, the evidence here shows that respondent and all the other fishermen of the "Madereinse" were seamen.

A thorough examination of the record and the petition establishes the fact that there is no undecided question presented to this Court, nor is this case one which calls for a review or reconsideration of any decisions of this Court.

II.

THE DECISION OF THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS IS NOT IN CONFLICT WITH APPLICABLE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT.

Respondents argue that the Jones Act is merely a venue statute. While the act provides for venue by requiring the action to be brought in the Court of the district wherein the employer resides or has his principal office, it also is a statute granting jurisdiction to both Federal Courts and State Courts to entertain seamen's cases based on negligence, and neither diversity of citizenship nor jurisdictional amount is requisite in the Federal Courts. The only requirement is that the case be one where a seaman has been injured in the service of his ship as a result of his employer's negligence.

The cases cited by respondent are not inconsistent with these principles or the decision of the Circuit Court.

Panama R. Co. v. Johnson (1924), 264 U. S. 375, 68 L. Ed. 748, 44 S. Ct. 391; Engel v. Davenport (1926), 271 U. S. 33, 70 L. Ed. 813, 46 S. Ct. 410.

In the Panama R. Co. case, supra, the Court said: "The cases arose under a law of the United States and involved the requisite amount, if any was requisite." (Our emphasis.)

That should calm petitioners' fears that a seaman might bring an action for $5.00 in a Federal Court and be entitled to a jury trial paid for with taxpayers' money. The United States has apparently not been worrying about being taken advantage of by seamen, as witness the fact that a seaman may maintain an action and prosecute an appeal in the Federal Courts without prepayment of costs or fees, or giving security therefor, 28 U.S.C.A., Sec. 837. (Act of June 12, 1917, ch. 27, Sec. 7, 40 Stat. 157; Act of July 1, 1918, ch. 113, Sec. 1, 40 Stat. 683.)

Petitioners forget that jurisdiction has two aspects, one being venue, for which the Jones Act provides, and the other being the power of the Court to entertain a particular action, for which the Jones Act also provides. The power of the Federal Courts to entertain a Jones Act case is not dependent on diversity of citizenship or jurisdictional amount, but is a case arising under a statute of the United States.

O'Donnell v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., supra;

Panama R. Co. v. Johnson, supra.

III.

THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS HAS NOT DECIDED CONTRARY TO ITS EARLIER DECISION ON JURISDICTION WITH REGARD TO THE SECOND CAUSE OF ACTION.

Petitioners contend that because the demand in the second cause of action was not in excess of $3000.00, and there was no diversity of citizenship, that the District Court lacked jurisdiction of the maintenance, wages, and cure count, and cite Modin v. Matson Navigation Co. (C.C.A. 9, 1942), 128 Fed. (2d) 194, 1942 A.M.C. 961, as authority. The cited case merely held that where the negligence part of the case had been dismissed, the maintenance cause was properly transferred to the admiralty side.

In our case, the negligence cause remained throughout, and the maintenance cause was properly joined. It is incidental to, and connected with the negligence cause. The cases are legion which hold that a maintenance cause can be separately brought, or joined with a Jones Act case, and the law side of the District Court has jurisdiction.

Pacific S. S. Co. v. Peterson (1928), 278 U. S. 130, 73 L. Ed. 220, 49 S. Ct. 75, 1928 A.M.C. 1932.

The same rule is declared in Nolan v. General Seafoods Corp., 112 Fed. (2d) 515, 517,

"In the case at bar, the plaintiff elected to sue under the Jones Act for negligence with an added count for maintenance and cure on account of injuries received in the service of the ship, which count may properly be joined with one under the Jones Act."

The same rule is stated in

Stevens v. R. O'Brien & Co. (C.C.A. 1, 1923), 62 Fed. (2d) 632, 633,

"Under a second count the appellant seeks to recover for maintenance and cure which may be joined with a count for negligence under section 33 of the Merchant Marine (Jones) Act."

It was held in

Smith v. Lykes Bros.-Ripley S. S. Co., Inc. (C.C.A. 5, 1939), 105 Fed. (2d) 604, 1939 A.M.C. 604, that a seaman might recover for damages under the Jones Act and bring a later action for maintenance and cure, or might join both counts in the same action.

The following cases hold that a cause for compensatory damages may be joined with a cause for maintenance, wages and cure:

Kongs v. Oceanic & Oriental Nav. Co. (D.C. Cal., 1931), 47 Fed. (2d) 650, 1931 A.M.C. 674;

Owens v. Hammond Lumber Co. (D.C. Cal., 1934), 8 Fed. Supp. 392;

"The S. S. Magdapur" (D.C. N.Y., 1933), 3 Fed. Supp. 971;

Oceanic Fisheries Co. v. U. S. F. & G. Co. (1941), 9 Wash. (2d) 484, 115 Pac. (2d) 714;

Flynn v. Panama R. Co. (N.Y., 1923), 201 N. Y. S. 56, 121 Misc. Rep. 239.

Inherent in

O'Donnell v. Great Lakes Dredge & Dock Co., supra,

is recognition of the principle that a cause under the Jones Act for compensatory damages may be joined with a count for maintenance and cure.

It is clear from the cited cases that it was quite proper for respondent to join his separate rights in one action under the Jones Act. The District Court, having jurisdiction of the damage aspect of the case on its law side, had jurisdiction of the maintenance, cure and wages count as an incident thereto. Respondent could have split his causes of action into two separate cases. Instead, as was his right, he chose to join them in one case and assert all his claims at one time. Petitioners should appreciate the fact that they were spared the expense and trouble of a second suit.

IV.

THE CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS HAS NOT DEPARTED FROM THE ACCEPTED AND USUAL COURSE OF JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS AND THIS IS NOT A CASE WHICH CALLS FOR AN EXERCISE OF THIS COURT'S POWER OF SUPERVISION.

Under this point, petitioners assail the evidence and the instructions. But a review of the evidence will clearly establish the fact that it supports the jury's verdict, and that the trial Court did not err in its rulings on evidence.

The rule on sufficiency of the evidence to sustain a jury finding in a Jones Act case is stated in Reskin v. Minnesota Atlantic Transit Co. (C.C. A. 2, 1940), 107 Fed. (2d) 743, 744, 1940 A.M.C. 111, 112,

"The sufficiency of the evidence as a basis for the verdict is to be tested by taking as the standard whatever facts the jury might reasonably have found which were supported by substantial evidence together with such reasonable inferences therefrom as might have been drawn."

And see

Armit v. Loveland (C.C.A. 3, 1940), 115 Fed. (2d) 308, 314.

Dr. Gallant's testimony of respondent's history was not hearsay, because it was not admitted for the purpose of proving the truth thereof, but rather as a basis for the doctor's opinion. This was proper.

The rule is stated in

Boyd v. Indus. Comm. of Utah (1935), 88 Utah 184, 48 Pac. (2d) 498, 501,

"Statements made to the attending physician which could aid or reasonably tend to aid in determining the nature of the injury, the nature of its cause, and thus more easily diagnose the case or to discover or interpret symptoms are admissible. These rest logically upon the necessity of the case. It is matter proper to be shown and not susceptible generally of being otherwise proven."

To the same effect:

Davis v. Renton (1931), 113 Cal. App. 561, 298 Pac. 113;

Rohner v. Cross (1932), 121 Cal. App. 667, 9 Pac. (2d) 509;

Sherwood v. Thomas (1932), 124 Cal. App. 450, 12 Pac. (2d) 676;

U. S. v. Tyrakowski (C.C.A. Ill., 1931), 50 Fed. (2d) 766;

Travelers Ins. Co. v. Person (C.C.A. Neb., 1932), 58 Fed. (2d) 210.

Petitioners argue on this petition the same points on the evidence which were rejected by the trial Court, the jury, and the Circuit Court of Appeals. Their inability to convince these bodies does not serve as a basis for their obtaining certiorari here.

Similarly, petitioners object to the instructions. But a review of the instructions will establish the fact that the jury was fully and fairly instructed on all the applicable issues of the case. The Circuit Court of Appeals so found.

DeZon v. American President Lines, supra;

Anelich v. "The Arizona", supra;

Cortes v. Baltimore Insular Lines, supra;

"The Iroquois", supra;

Beadle v. Spencer (1936), 298 U. S. 124, 80 L. Ed. 1082, 56 S. Ct. 712;

Rooker v. Alaska S. S. Co. (1936), 185 Wash. 71, 53 Pac. (2d) 295, cert. den. 299 U. S. 552;

Socony-Vacuum Oil Co. v. Smith (1939), 305 U. S. 424, 83 L. Ed. 265, 59 S. Ct. 262.

V.

THE FACT THAT COUNSEL FOR PETITIONERS HAS ANOTHER CASE PENDING ON CERTIORARI (LUKSICH v. MISETICH) IS NO BASIS FOR GRANTING CERTIORARI IN THIS CASE.

Respondent has not been furnished with nor has he read the record in the Luksich case, nor is he in any way familiar with that case. It is rather a novel experience to be presented with a brief in a case with which one has no connection and have that fact urged as the basis for allowing certiorari in a case in which one is interested.

It appears, however, from a perusal of Mr. Gallagher's brief in the Luksich case that he is still laboring the point of what kind of an election a seaman has as between the seaman's right to bring an action for damages under the Jones Act based on negligence, or under the general maritime law for unseaworthiness, and the cumulative remedy to maintenance, cure and wages. We have discussed this matter in detail under Point I, and see nothing more in the Luksich brief which would impel this Court to grant certiorari here because of what may or may not be involved there.

Unlike Mr. Gallagher, counsel for respondent finds no confusion in the cases on this question of a seaman's election, but feels that the law as enunciated by this Court on these matters is quite clear and easily understood.

CONCLUSION.

Respondent respectfully submits that petitioners have not brought themselves within the rule of this Court which would cause the issuance of a writ of certiorari and that this petition therefor should be disallowed.

Dated, San Francisco, California,
May 22, 1944.

HERBERT RESNER,
Attorney for Respondent.
